

To start off with the findings that surprised me, I was interested to see that HR Consultants make more money (on average), than Data Scientists, Financial Analysts, and Accountants. I also assumed almost all of the jobs I searched for would have extensive on-the-job training, and was shocked to see that none of them offered that. In terms of my rankings, I would order them from best to worst: Management Analyst, Information Security Analyst, Financial Analyst, Data Scientist, Quality Assurance, HR Consultant, Accountant, Lawyer. I mainly ranked these based on the general knowledge I have of the occupation, with the terrifying prospect of law school sending Lawyer to last. As a Management Analyst, I would be primarily working with either a client or team, allowing me to be predominantly interactive and collaborative with peers. I am most interested in management consultant work and data analyst related work, which is why the top four are relatively similar.
